PREFACE

"THERE is not a satisfactory French Dictionary on the market." This constant reproach of the last thirty years renders less than justice to much excellent work done in the past by Elwall, Bellows, Boëlle, Tarver, and others; it is none the less true that no French and English dictionary hitherto available has proved adequate to the needs of the serious student.

The just grounds of complaint may be brought under the following heads. In the first place, existing dictionaries are, and always have been, a full generation behind their day in their content, and most of them are too small to be of any 'real use.' The range of human knowledge and invention has extended so greatly during the last two generations that it is materially impossible to cover it in any work of small bulk.

In the next place, bilingual dictionaries are not scientific in their treatment of words, and have not kept pace with the progress in philology that has been so notable in recent years.

Lastly, the mind of the lexicographer seems invariably to be anchored in the past; French phrases in current use are translated into early Victorian English, if not into that of Queen Anne, while a modern English or American colloquialism is rendered, tant bien que mal, in the language of Molière. This archaism of phrasing has become glaringly noticeable since the World War. In the vocabulary and phraseology of the peoples involved the reactions have been as violent as in the spheres of sociology and economics, and both French and English have been permanently affected to a degree that can no longer be ignored.

Messrs Harrap & Co. had already before the War laid their plans for the preparation of a new French and English dictionary that should mark a step in advance of what had been achieved up to that time. Material that had not been available to dictionary makers of the last century was at hand to facilitate the task. In France the publication of Hatzfeld and Darmiester's Dictionnaire Général had been nothing short of epoch-making; in Britain the New English Dictionary was approaching completion; in Germany Plattner had finished the compilation of his Ausführliche Grammatik and of its Supplements.

In 1919 it was felt that the time was opportune for making a start, and a staff was brought together, whose first task it was to inventory the material ready to hand and to prepare some experimental pages of the French-English part. At the same time the general lines of the work were laid down, what it was proposed to include and what must be considered as lying outside our province.

In the first place this must be a dictionary of the present day, as far as it was possible for any work of reference ever to claim that it is up to date; and this must involve the clearing away of a large amount of archaic lumber still persisting in most dictionaries, echoes of short-lived fashions and of outworn techniques that had their day and passed out of our civilization, without leaving any permanent mark on our phraseology. At the same time a modern work of reference must continue to provide a key to the great treasure-houses of French and English literature, within limits and dates which we had to fix.

With regard to France this is a matter of little difficulty. The great bulk of the educated classes live in full enjoyment of the patrimony handed down to them from their 'Grand Siècle'; their acquaintance with Montaigne and Ronsard may be scrappy and superficial, but they are nurtured on the 17th-century dramatists and moralists, on La Fontaine and Mme de Sévigné; in this school their style is formed; their literature of to-day is full of an allusiveness that takes for granted intimate acquaintance with the great works of this period, and not a few present-day writers, in a full-dress article or speech, will revert to a severely 'classical' French as their medium of expression. Thus no dictionary of the French language, however 'modern,' can leave out of account the vocabulary and syntax of the seventeenth century.

Where to draw the line in English is a question more controversial. Broadly speaking, and for all that the Bible, Shakespeare, and Milton are so 'full of quotations,' the language of the centuries preceding the nineteenth has aged much more than is the case with French; our school acquaintance with Fielding, Richardson, Burke, and Pope is negligible in comparison to the lycéen's intimacy with his great classics, and does not condition our present-day idiom to nearly the same degree. At the same time the vocabulary of English is so extensive that considerations of space make the elimination of unessentials even more imperative than for French, and it was deemed wise to remain, broadly speaking, within the limits of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

In neither language, of course, is it possible to lay down hard and fast rules. A dictionary, as opposed to a word-list, must be a record of the diction, of the phrasing and idiom, peculiar to the languages under consideration, and much of this idiom enshrines words and phrases now forgotten, but which must of necessity be noted in order that a surviving use may be understood.

The next point to be decided was: what classes of readers and students we proposed to serve by the publication of this work. The aim was to supply the needs of 'everybody'; not only the general reader and the 'man in the street'—with his wife, but also the historian, the professional man, lawyer or physician, banker or stockbroker, architect or schoolmaster, soldier or sailor; the technician, builder or engineer, printer or binder.

The preparation of a few pages on this ambitious scale led to an early realization that a project conceived on these lines was impracticable; the work must assume the proportions of an encyclopaedia, and defeat its object through sheer wealth of material and the resultant laboriousness of consultation. In order therefore to keep within the limits of a volume easy to handle and reasonable in cost, we decided that we should aim at helping 'everyman' to read, understand, and even translate, his foreign newspaper, from the leaders to the advertisements. This in itself is a very large undertaking. The better-class newspapers of to-day, whether French or English, reflect the whole of our daily life and activities, and cater for the most varied interests. Politics, literary and dramatic criticism, law and market reports, and advertisements of sales, constitute only a fraction of their daily contents; new inventions and scientific developments form the subject of articles by specialists who are no longer required to express themselves in strictly 'non-technical' language. For in an age of private motor cars, home-built wireless sets, and electricity 'on tap' for domestic purposes, we are all more or less engineers. Our interests are further taken up with flying displays, watched with critical appreciation of loops and zooms; with movies and talkies; with racing and gracing and the tote. We rely on our paper to keep us up to date regarding the quantum theory, relativity, and the ether-drift; we expect guidance from the same source on the psychics of bidding in the evening's game of bridge.

It has been our endeavour to build up a dictionary that shall deal, if not exhaustively, at any rate adequately, with all these things. Further on will be found a list of encyclopaedias and reference books that have been laid constantly under contribution; special mention should be made of the new and recast editions of Chambers' Encyclopaedia and the Grand Dictionnaire Larousse; most of the latter publication appeared in time to allow us to scan its pages. But from the start it was obvious that we could not hope to obtain immediate touch with the times we live in by means of textbooks and dictionaries alone, and that to supplement these we must collect and 'card' our own material. For ten years we have accumulated words and phrases from current works of fiction, from the daily press of both countries concerned, and from periodicals such as La Science Moderne and 'Nature.' We enrolled as unconscious collaborators many translators of French into English, of English into French—not all translations are bad, as is too frequently assumed. The number of cards thus collected approximates to 200,000. To establish translations of all these entries was not always an easy task. It entailed correspondence with specialists at home and abroad, and in a number of cases several years have elapsed before a card on the 'waiting list' was duly translated and filed. Most of this material was used in the first place in drafting the French-English section of the Dictionary, and then redistributed under an English head-word.

Thus, when we started on the preparation of the English-French section, a large amount of material lay ready to our hand; but every day produced its quota of English words and phrases that had not come under notice in the first part of the work, and for which renderings must be established. The latter were carded back under a French head-word, and utilized in due course for the revision and completion of the first draft of the French-English section. It is owing to this method of work that we flatter ourselves that in our renderings of much of the idiom of the two languages there will be found a breadth of vocabulary and a raciness that mark an advance on what has been achieved hitherto. In actual number of words we have not widely exceeded the range of the dictionaries already in common use. Under the French letter A, for instance, a count shows only three to four hundred new entries. As a matter of fact, new coinages in a language, of the type of arpetle, aspirine, paravane, are of rare occurrence; more frequent as neologisms are compounds or derivatives of elements already in established use, such as amérir, aéroflotte, accumètre, affût-trépiéd, autobus, autocar, and the English 'aerobatics,' 'to entrain,' 'to detrain'; borrowings from dialect or from a foreign idiom, such as braderie and batik; the 'commonizing' of proper names: un decauville, or derivation from proper names: bauxite. Any new word, when well established, may generate a number of derivatives: the newly popular braderie has already given the back-formation 'Ici on bradera'; amérir gives amérissage; from batik has been formed a verb bauker, and there is no reason why batikage, débatiker, rebatiker, should not come as readily to the tongue or from the pen.

The sum total of these additions to our store of words in the course of a generation is comparatively small; the real accretion to the vocabulary comes from the extension of the semantic range of the words already in common use. The manifold developments of the last fifty years, telephony, motoring, flying, cinematography, radiology, 'wireless,' psycho-analysis, and what not, have all been made to 'fit in' to the existing vocabulary. We steer a car with a wheel: French has extended the use of volant to meet this emergency; we emit and receive our broadcasts through a wire or wires stretched aloft: we have called into service the word 'aerial,' French has extended the range of the word antenne; we fire our motor engines with 'plugs,' the French use bougies; where at tennis we 'lob' a ball, the French play it en chandelle.

This enormous development in the uses of familiar words will be found more adequately mirrored in this dictionary than in any work hitherto available.

Another matter that required more care than is generally vouchsafed to it was the indication of the syntactical relations of the word, as a unit of speech, with its environment. Sentences are knit together by links—prepositions, phrases, conjunctions, concords, uses of tense and mood—according to a 'mechanism' of which the grammar expounds the general principles; but it is the part of a dictionary to indicate the actual links required by, or commonly associated with, any given noun, pronoun, adjective, or verb. This we have done more fully, and more methodically, than has been heretofore attempted. For English syntactical uses we were able to found upon the Concise Oxford Dictionary and Mr H. W. Fowler's Dictionary of Modern English Usage, with reference, when this was needful, to the New English Dictionary. For French our chief source of reference has been Plattner's Ausführliche Grammatik, largely supplemented by material gleaned and carded from our own reading, and by that accumulated by Mr G. H. Clarke in his Manuel-Lexique.

In our range of words we have gone far beyond the Dictionnaire de l'Académie; and, besides technical terms, have admitted very freely what is commonly known as argot or 'slang,' at least such part of it as is well established in French and English, and indispensable to an understanding of the 'réalistes' and 'naturalistes' who have bulked so largely in modern literature. How far it is permissible to go in recording these lower strata of the vocabulary is, with regard to such a free-spoken language as French, a question of some delicacy; we established our own censorship, too strict, no doubt, from a French point of view, somewhat lax, perhaps, for Mrs Grundy.

We have extended a wide hospitality to Americanisms; many of these, indeed, have already taken out papers of naturalization; many more are old acquaintances, and by way of becoming intimate friends; they have qualities of terseness and breeziness that give them a value all their own. As regards the hundreds of English words that are current in French to-day, these are left unrecorded if they have been taken over unchanged in spelling and meaning (e.g. 'durbar'). But if they have been adapted (doper, knockouter, turfiste, schampooing), or mutilated (un drop-goal, un shake-hand), or contracted (un dancing, un shaker, un skating), or taken over with a change or extension of meaning (carter, five-o'clock, flirt, footing, groom, mail-coach, snob), we have thought them worthy of inclusion.

Two classes of words offer special difficulties to the dictionary maker: those pertaining to law and administration on the one hand, on the other those that cover the field of natural history.

The legal systems of France and England rest on different foundations, and for much of their technical phrasing there is no parallelism between the two languages. When possible we suggest approximate equivalents: and where none exist, we have provided adequate explanations.

As for the names of animals and plants, precision in translation will be unattainable so long as the Latin nomenclatures have not been standardized and internationalized. At present French works of reference are frequently at variance in their nomenclature not only with English works but among themselves, and the inquirer finds himself floundering in a morass of contradictions. The conclusions arrived at can only be offered 'sous toutes réserves.'

For assistance in the labour of compilation of material, and in the final arrangement of the matter under each vocable, we owe grateful thanks to a number of collaborators, some of whom were able to give us their assistance only for a time, and especially to Miss K. Wattie, M.A., and Mr H. R. Elphick, who have been associated with the undertaking since its inception. Mr Elphick has acted secretariaily; his gift of organization and genius for ferreting out recondite information have been invaluable. We owe much also to the assistance given by M. A. Pruvot, L. ès L., L. en Dr., M. J. Guillemonat, L. ès L., L. en Dr., and M. E. Thevenot, L. ès L., who in turn joined in our labours; and special thanks are due to M. M. Ferlin, agrégé d'anglais, who for many years has sent us sheaves of 'glanures,' and who has kindly read a large portion of the proofs. The whole work has been sub-edited from the beginning by Mr C. W. Bell, M.A., and in recent years also by Mr F. M. Atkinson. Their keen sense of language and fertility in constructive criticism have saved us from many sins of commission; for those that remain the Editor alone must assume responsibility.

Lastly we must pay our tribute to the unfailing helpfulness and resource of the printers, and in particular to the competency of the operator and the reader on whom fell the responsibility of transforming the MS. into almost impeccable proof.

NOTE TO THE SECOND EDITION

A reprint of Part I of this Dictionary being called for, we have been enabled to make a number of textual alterations—correction of misprints, improvement of renderings, additions to the meanings of words already recorded—and to add a number of words that have recently come into prominence. The paging has not been changed. We take this opportunity to thank the many correspondents to whose suggestions many of the additions and corrections are due.

August, 1939.

PLAN OF THE DICTIONARY

In each part the entire contents have been arranged in one alphabetical order. The common practice of relegating biographical, geographical, and other proper names to special sections at the end of the volume entails double entries when, as is frequent, a proper name takes on new functions as a common noun, or vice versa, and is wasteful of both space and time. It was thought advisable, however, to group the current abbreviations of the language into a special alphabetical list, which will be found at the end of the volume.

Proper names of persons, gods, towns, rivers, etc., are entered only when they differ in spelling in the two languages, or offer some point of interest worth recording. They nevertheless form a very comprehensive list.

The pronunciation of every word has been given; in the French part the notation adopted is that of the Association Phonétique Internationale; its few special symbols can be memorized in a quarter of an hour, and there is no other satisfactory notation that can be mastered so readily. Where there is diversity of custom in the pronunciation of a word the alternatives have been shown.

'Etymologies' do not come within our province. In some French-English dictionaries they take up much valuable space, while merely duplicating information that is readily accessible elsewhere. But while we make no parade of philology, we have endeavoured to treat each word on a philological basis. In the first place care has been taken not to 'jumble up' words of totally different extraction. When under entries such as appareiller, arbitre, arche, bachot, bander, barder, bille, binette, two or sometimes three unrelated homonyms are treated as one word, their semantic values and development are hopelessly obscured. The present century has been productive of much valuable work in tracing words to their source and in discriminating between homonyms, but of this work no cognizance has been taken up to now in French-English dictionaries.

Again, in the unfolding of the various meanings of a word, its historical evolution has been taken as a basis, the earliest meaning or meanings being only omitted when they have passed out of the language, and are not to-day present to the mind of native speakers of French or English.

We have used numbers and letters to divide the word into semantic units, therein following Elwall and others; but we have departed from Elwall's practice in one important respect. Whereas he first tabulates the various meanings of the word under consideration, and then proceeds to deal with phrase and idiom, the course adopted here has been to bring together in one semantic group everything that belongs to that group. Language abounds in familiar phrases that pertain in the first place to the technics of sailing, of war, of industry or art; others are rooted in past religions, history, or literature; all such are illuminated, and best understood, when brought back within the semantic group from which they sprang, and first exemplified in their literal or technical use, if this has not become totally effaced. The matter has been arranged on this plan as nearly as is possible in our present state of knowledge of the history of French and English.

It is often difficult to decide under which catchword to enter a phrase that presents two or more 'centres of interest,' e.g. 'once bitten twice shy,' 'hunger is the best sauce,' 'to kill two birds with one stone.' In a bilingual dictionary choice will favour the key-word that is most apposite from the point of view of the translation suggested; but as this is a matter which the consulter of the dictionary cannot decide a priori, cross-references have been given in great abundance. Intensive similes, of the type of 'as sharp as a needle,' 'as fit as a fiddle,' are regularly entered under the adjective.

The immediate business of a bilingual dictionary is to supply translations, to set the English word against the French word, and phrase against phrase. Therefore no definitions are given, and explanation is reduced to a minimum. Râteau is translated by 'rake' without mention of its being un instrument de jardinage. Sufficient that the catchword is followed by the abbreviation for 'Tools,' and that its 'rake's progress' is thereby limited to the garden path. The list of abbreviations of this type is very extensive, and these specifications of the uses of words will be found to leave little room for ambiguity.

There are no acknowledged 'quotations from standard authors'; on the contrary, the need for exercising the utmost economy of space has compelled resort to telegraphic style whenever possible. Points of vocabulary and syntax were gleaned in thousands from modern literature and standard works of reference, but the sentence in which they were embodied has in the majority of cases been shorn of its appendages, and commonly reduced to the infinitive form, in order to achieve compression. In many cases nevertheless the source of the entry remains immediately recognizable, whether, in this first part, it be Molière, the Code, or M. Francis Carco.

Pronominal verbs are dealt with in a separate article following the simple verb, provided that in the pronominal form the verb assumes new meanings or constructions. Thus the verb battre is followed by a special entry for the verb se battre, 'to fight'; s'apercevoir de quelque chose is treated apart from apercevoir, se plaindre de quelque'un apart from plaindre. But if the pronominal form is merely a reflexive use of the simple verb, implying no change of meaning, it is not treated as a separate entity. Thus se couper au doigt is dealt with under couper; the reciprocal use ils s'aiment, 'they love one another,' will be found under aimer; the passive equivalent cet article se vend bien under vendre.

It is often a matter of some difficulty, and even of controversy, to decide when a past participle assumes a purely adjectival function. The two uses merge one into the other, and it has been deemed advisable to place the past participial adjective immediately after the verb, in order that the two articles may be read and consulted as one. The participle may further function as a noun, in which case the noun also will be found in this location. In many cases, e.g. acquérir, acquis; mourir, mort, this has involved a departure from alphabetical order. Whenever this is the case, the participial form will be found entered in its proper alphabetical place, with a reference to the relevant verb. All verbal forms that offer a departure from the stem of the infinitive have also been entered in their place, and referred to the verb under its infinitive form. For all 'irregular' verbs a skeleton of the conjugation is given immediately after the infinitive, but no full paradigms have been supplied. The student is assumed to possess a French grammar.

For convenience of abbreviation common nouns have been described as 'substantives' (masculine or feminine): s.m., s.f., while proper names have been entered as Pr.n.m., Pr.n.f. (or in the case of most names of towns, merely as Pr.n.). It frequently happens that a proper name also functions as a common noun, and for the sake of compression both uses have been entered under one catchword. The description 'proper name' implies the use of a capital letter; the description 'substantive' implies a small initial. Thus also parisien, italien, and similar geographical derivatives are described as 'adjective and substantive' (a. & s.); they should be understood to take a capital in the latter function.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PRONUNCIATION

THE symbols used are those of the Association Phonétique Internationale. A few points call for special mention.

1. While this notation is on the whole adequate to the representation of French sounds, it suffers from the lack of a symbol for a middle e, less open than [ɛ] in père, not so close as [e] in donné, and commonly heard in unstressed syllables: atterrir, saisir, régner, réglable, rêveur. (The accents afford no guide to the pronunciation; e has the same sound in je mènerai and je céderai, in avènement and événement.) This intermediate e has been transliterated by [e] or [ɛ] according to common practice, but there appears to be a growing tendency to open the unstressed e, especially before [a], [ɑ], or [ã] (though not in the case of prefixes such as dé- or mé-), and the symbol [ɛ̃] has been used as perhaps more nearly accurate than [e] in words such as assèchement, pondération, pédale. The reader will however bear in mind that no more than a middle e is implied.

2. The ending -ation has been transliterated throughout by [asjã]. The pronunciation [asjã], or even [a:sjã], prevalent in some strata of Parisian speech, need hardly be taken as standard for France.

3. For the ending -aille the pronunciations [a:j] and [ɑ:j] are both current, perhaps with a difference. In the following pages it is rendered by [a:j] as a rule, but by [ɑ:j] when pejorative.

4. Syllables have been indicated as long [:] only when final, and the half-length sign [·] has not been used in this work. While there is an acknowledged difference in the pronunciation of reine [rɛ:n] and renne [ren], of héros [e'ro] and hérault [ero], these discriminations would have led us into a field of pure phonetics—and of much controversy.

5. The stress is not indicated in the French-English part. It may be assumed to fall, however slightly, on the last sounded syllable of the word, when the latter is considered apart from a word-group.
